TRUCK ACCIDENTS

How Does A Truck Accident Differ From A Typical Auto Accident Case?

A semi-truck accident differs from your typical automobile accident case. In a semi-truck accident, it's likely that you will be dealing with one or more "commercial" insurance policies. These "commercial" policies, which are required by law, do not have the same rules as the typical automobile policies you may be familiar with.

For example, these policies have much higher policy limits, and are typically a minimum of $1 million dollars. These limits give you much better chances of having ample insurance coverage to pay for the medical treatment, pain and suffering, lost wages, etc. of truck accident victims. Hopefully your injuries will not require you to utilize the full extent of the insurance policy.

Time To Resolve Claim

When it comes to the time frame for settling a truck accident case, there is only one thing that is certain: Patience can prove to be invaluable. Any attorney who is honest will tell you the same thing that we tell our clients - "There is simply no way to tell how long your case will take to settle."

It's important to remember that building your case will take time. Trying to rush into a settlement, or "make things happen quicker" will only harm your claim, and will usually decrease your compensation.

Costs and Fees

Wright Law firm accepts Truck accident cases on a contingency fee basis. This means that if you were injured in a truck accident, you NEVER have to pay us up front costs or hourly rates while we work on your case. This contingent fee arrangement is especially advantageous for our persons injured in 18-wheeler truck accidents because truck accident claims often require outside expert analysis and special investigation, which are expensive, and usually make it cost-prohibitive for an injured person to try and handle the claim on their own.

Why is the Trucking Company's Representative So Aggressive?

After a semi-truck accident, there will be many people at the scene of the accident, such as rescue personnel, police officers, fire fighters, and tow truck drivers. However, there will also be someone you wouldn't expect to be at the scene of the accident - The representative for the trucking company. Often, the trucking company insurance representative will arrive at the accident scene within minutes in order to take pictures, interview witnesses, and compile their version of the events in order to avoid or limit the liability their company will face in the event of a lawsuit. That's why you need expert legal advice as soon as possible following a truck accident.

The reason that trucking company representatives will try to get to the scene of the accident quickly is to try to snap incriminating photographs, measure skid marks, and sometimes even alter or remove evidence that might contradict the actual events that took place.

Invariably, the trucking company's version of the accident will place you at fault. They do this to limit their liability, and will often use this information later to force you to accept a much smaller settlement than you otherwise would have.
